Tropical forest ecosystems are of global importance and interest for several reasons. They are home to the great majority of species on this planet Earth. They house an astounding complexity of ecological interactions among species as well as with their environment. They protect watersheds, modulate stream flow, and minimize soil erosion. Their protection in national parks and equivalent reserves is a high priority for international organizations, national agencies, and local communities. Yet the destruction of tropical forests depletes natural resources, destroys environmental services, and is a significant source of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse
