

Comparing Traditional Ecological Knowledge and Western Science

Traditional Ecological Knowledge (TEK)

Knowledge is created through long-term personal and cultural experiences, direct observation in local settings, and through metaphysical and physical connections to the land, linked to a moral code/value system.

Knowledge is holistic, cumulative, and specific to a region or place.

Knowledge is disseminated through interpersonal, intergenerational, and oral communications. Communication may be via metaphors and stories connected to life, values, and proper behavior.

Knowledge emphasizes practical application to, and integration in, daily living, including traditional subsistence practices.

In relation to land and resources management (e.g., forestry), the focus is on species traditionally gathered for subsistence uses and valued for culturally and spiritually significant benefits/practices.

Knowledge is based on relations with the natural world, respect for all things, embraces complexity and recognizes interconnected components.

Knowledge builds on trust for inherited wisdom; qualitative experience; person to person and its particularization.

Western Science (WS)

Knowledge is created through formal education and training, field observation, and professional experience.

Knowledge is discipline-based.

Knowledge is disseminated through written documentation, recorded imagery, and oral communication in formal settings.

Knowledge requires verification through scientific research and field observation, which is limited to evidence and explanation within the physical world.

In relation to land and resources management (e.g., forestry), the focus is on statistical and spatial modeling, species-specific silvicultural principles, and commercially valuable species, as well as aesthetics.

Knowledge is applied broadly; uses averaging to infer trends; simplifies and divides complexity ("Part to whole").

Knowledge builds on quantitative written record; communication of procedures, evidence, and theory; mathematical models; micro and macro theory.

Build knowledge through scientific method: observation, experimentation, analysis, conclusion; those steps must occur in a particular order.

Use pattern recognition.

Verify through repetition.

A body of knowledge is stable but subject to modification. Empirical observation is central.
