

2 The Recent History of Second Language Learning Research

2.1 Introduction

In order to understand current developments in second language learning research, it is helpful to retrace its recent history. We will see throughout this chapter that the kind of questions researchers are asking today are for the most part firmly rooted in earlier developments in the fields of linguistics, psychology, sociology and pedagogy.

The first part of this chapter explores in general terms the theoretical foundations of today's thinking. More detailed reviews can be found elsewhere, such as de Bot (2015), Dulay, Burt, and Krashen (1982), Gass (2009), Ortega (2014), Selinker (1992), Tarone (2015), Thomas (2004, 2013) and VanPatten and Williams (2015). However, ideas coming from cognitive psychology also became increasingly significant. Research strands initiated in the 1980s will then systematically be reviewed and evaluated in the rest of the book, as well as some newer trends which made their appearance in the 1990s and beyond. On the one hand, cognitive and psycholinguistic theorizing have developed considerably. On the other hand, there has emerged what has been described as the "social turn" in SLA (Block, 2003), with greatly increased interest in learner identity and agency, and the wider social context for SLA. This social turn is linked to more
