A Suburb of Europe Jerzy Jedlicki, 1999 In this lively and original book the distinguished Polish historian Jerzy Jedlicki tells the story of a century long Polish dispute over the merits and demerits of the Western model of liberal progress and industrial civilization As in several countries of Europe also in Poland intellectuals conservatives liberals and later socialists quarrelled about whether such a model would suit and benefit their nation or whether it would spell the ruin of its distinctive cultural features This heated debate revolved around several pairs of opposing ideas native cultures v cosmopolitan civilization natural v artificial ways of economic development Christian morals

v capitalist laissez faire traditional customs v mobile society romanticism v scientism and so on It is these various aspects of the main issue which the author analyzes and links together here He describes how difficult and painful the process of modernization was in a nation deprived of its political independence and cultural autonomy
