Successful Ageing Patricia McCann Mortimer, 2010 Current mainstream models of successful ageing have received criticism in the literature especially Rowe and Kahn s 1987 model the most widely accepted theory of successful ageing in gerontology A key aim for the present study is to challenge the key mainstream theories of successful ageing This thesis asks whether the dominant perspectives on successful ageing can be challenged by directly consulting older women about how they see the roles of religion and spirituality in ageing well and by unpacking specific problems identified in the literature

Criticisms include the lack of consultation with older people by successful ageing researchers. A second issue is the negative way that the last phase of life or Fourth Age Laslett 1989 is represented in successful ageing theories and also in the field of gerontology and society generally. The leading models of successful ageing from Rowe and Kahn and Baltes and Baltes 1990 postulate that successful ageing is contingent on certain capacities and that successful ageing comes to an end when health and good functioning or the capacity to employ adaptive strategies fails. Hence life in very old age is represented as a picture of loss and decline with no positive prospects. A third criticism relates to the lack of inclusion of religious and spiritual affiliations which may be important resources for psychological, spiritual and existential well-being, particularly during the final phase of life. This issue is investigated with participants identified as both spiritual and religious (SR) and as spiritual only and not religious (SO). Some researchers have argued that women do not age as well as men and that older women are usually less financially well-off and in poorer health than their male counterparts across all levels of socio-economic status (Greene 2003, Smith-Baltes 1998). The views of women were sought in order to contribute to balancing the gender scales of ageing well. The focus in this research is on the views of women who are in midlife or older on successful ageing. The research design of mixed models used qualitative data derived from focus groups and in-depth individual interviews supplemented by quantitative data gained from surveys. Three broad central themes encompassing participants' views on successful ageing were identified. Most participants viewed life as a journey of growth and development and for some this extended beyond poor health and functioning. Autonomy was valued by most participants. Relationships were also important and nearly all participants gained much personal satisfaction from generative activities consistent with the literature. Some participants provided examples of successful ageing occurring in the final stages of life or Fourth Age (Laslett 1989). A number regarded the current options for frail aged accommodation and end-of-life care with fear and dread. These findings point to the need for researchers and policy makers to listen carefully to the voices of ageing people. Based on participants' comments, there is a need for informed and tailored changes to be made in policy planning, physical accommodation options and crucially to the training of those who work with older people. The development of more positive whole-of-life theories of successful ageing is urgently required in order to counterbalance the dominant negative perspectives on the final phase of life.

Digital Media and the Daily Lives of China's Senior Citizens Chen Guo, 2025-08-12. Guo provides a comprehensive outlook of how digital media is transforming the daily lives of senior citizens in China. The book explores the important role digital media play in senior citizens' daily lives and the disparities of third agers' digital well-being. It applies the concepts of digital capital and individualisation to China and uses a combination of qualitative research including interviews with seniors and focus groups with recent data on media use, aging and demography. Its fieldwork with seniors conducted in a second-tier city of China provides insights on how the process of digitalisation has transformed seniors' daily lives. A valuable book for scholars and researchers in sociology, digital media, active aging, population, gerontology and China studies. Successful Aging Paul
