Eh? queried Tom, Reade turning around from his distant view of a sharp, towering peak of the Rockies. There's the real thing in the way of a westerner! Harry Hazelton insisted in a voice in which there was some awe. I don't believe he is, retorted Tom skeptically. You're going to say I suppose that the man is just some freak escaped from the pages of a dime novel, demanded Harry. No, he looks more like a hostler on a leave of absence from a stranded Wild West show, Tom replied slowly. There was plenty of time for them to inspect the stranger in question. Tom and Harry were seated on a mountain springboard wagon drawn by a pair of thin horses. Their driver, a boy of about eighteen, sat on a tiny, make-believe seat almost over the traces. This youthful driver had been minding his own business so assiduously during the past three hours that Harry had voted him a sullen fellow. This, however, the driver was not.
