A methodology for computing effective average tax rates on factor incomes and consumption using OECD data from national accounts and revenue statistics is described and applied to construct time series of tax rates for the group of seven largest industrialized countries These tax rates are compared with estimates of effective marginal tax rates obtained in other studies The stylized facts that distinguish tax systems across countries are documented and the co movements between the tax rates and savings investment net exports unemployment and hours worked are also examined The results of this analysis illustrate some of the potential implications of tax policies currently under consideration and suggest that the proposed tax rates are useful approximations to those faced by representative agents in dynamic macroeconomic models

Industrial Canada ,1922 Tax Base Variability and Procyclical Fiscal Policy Ernesto Talvi,2000 Based on a sample of 56 countries we find that while fiscal policy in the G 7 countries appears to be broadly consistent with Barro s tax smoothing proposition in developing countries government spending and taxes are highly procyclical i e government spending rises and taxes fall during expansions while the reverse is true in recessions To explain this puzzle we develop an optimal fiscal policy model in which running budget surpluses is costly because they create pressures to increase public spending Given this distortion a government that faces large and perfectly anticipated fluctuations in the tax base will find it optimal to run a procyclical fiscal policy We argue that the differences in fiscal policy between the G 7 countries and developing countries can be traced back to the fact that the tax base is much more volatile in developing countries than in the G 7 countries
