The Sound Of One Mind Thinking:

The Sound of One Mind Thinking Eugene M. Schwartz, 1979 The Sound That Perceives the World Kosho Uchiyama, 2025-11-25 Musings and autobiographically informed commentary on the human condition through the lens of the Kannon gyo chapter 25 of the Lotus Sutra connecting Zen and Pure Land Buddhism through the practice of venerating and chanting the names of buddhas and bodhisattvas The Kannon gyo is chapter 25 of the Lotus Sutra and its focus is the bodhisattva of compassion Avalokiteshvara known in China as Guanyin and in Japan as Kannon or Kanzeon The text describes the many ways in which calling out the bodhisattva's name Namu Kanzeon Bosatsu can relieve suffering Most schools of Zen Buddhism and especially the Soto school eschew such practices as chanting the names of buddhas and bodhisattvas along with venerating such figures The eminent Soto Zen master Kosho Uchiyama Roshi however while doing hard physical labor early in his career could not practice zazen that is formal sitting meditation He came to appreciate the Kannon gyo and the practices related to it In particular he took to reciting Kannon's name as recommended in the text of the Kannon gyo Later in life Uchiyama Roshi suffered from illness that again prevented him from practicing formal Zen so he returned to the Kannon gyo and the practice of chanting He went so far as to assert that chanting Kannon's name is completely equivalent to zazen that the two practices are simply two sides of the same coin a revolutionary idea seemingly at odds with Zen Chanting practice is especially accessible as it can be done while working traveling or suffering from illness and other activities that would ordinarily get in the way of formal Zen practice With these practices the Kannon gyo and Kannon herself as a backdrop Uchiyama Roshi muses about the purposes of religion the goals of religious practice and the meaning of enlightenment and their relation to suffering itself
