The link between crime and alcohol and the efficacy of institutional and community programs in modifying drinking behavior receive critical attention in this text. The authors discuss how treatment will help to prevent persistent criminal behavior and point out the obligation of correctional agencies to provide appropriate program services. They assess current offender and nonoffender alcohol treatment programs, examine the available research on program efficacy, and recommend treatment methods most likely to be effective in rehabilitating the alcohol-abusing offender. Guidelines for evaluating correctional alcohol abuse programs conclude the text.
