that the wounds caused by bots in the stomach and elsewhere may have serious and even fatal consequences although the perforations of the stomach which are not infrequently noticed in post mortem examinations of horses that have been infested with bots have in the large majority of cases been made by these larva after death PKEY ENTION The best means of prevention are keeping tho horse away from pasture land during the season when the gadfly lays her eggs and picking or clipping them off when they are seen on the skin When found ill large numbers on the coat we may with advantage rub them over with a mixture of one part of paraffin oil and two parts of sweet oil the effect of which will be destructive to the eggs and deterrent to the female gadflies TREATMENT Generally speaking bots in the stomach require no treatment for they have as a rule but little hurtful effect 011 the horse medicines do not appear to have much power in dislodging them and they pass out at their appointed time Although I have not tried the experiment I am inclined to think that a course of tartar emetic say two drachms a day in the food for a fortnight would have a marked influence in expelling these parasites If bots are seen to be lodged in the rectum they can be removed by the hand the horse may be given an enema of 6 oz of oil of turpentine and 3 pints of linseed oil and the inside of the anus may be smeared round with a little mercurial ointment on the finger If bots are lodged at the back of the mouth they may be detached by brushing them over with eucalyptus oil or a mixture of one part of oil of turpentine
