ridge of mountain standing above it catching the midnight summer sun the same mist forming over the river but the house was altogether different Now there stood only a poor heap of farm buildings erected of turf and wood where had once been a noble hall of wood with carved gable ends surrounded by many out houses Before we begin on the story of Grettir it will be well to say a few words about its claim to be history Iceland never was and it is not now a much peopled island The farmhouses are for the most part far apart and the farms are of very considerable extent because owing to the severity of the climate very little pasturage is obtained over a wide extent of country for the sheep and cattle The population lives round the coast on the fiords or creeks of the sea or on the rivers that flow into these fiords The centre of the island is occupied by a vast waste of ice covered mountain and desert black as ink strewn with volcanic ash and sand or else with a region of erupted lava that is impassable because in cooling it has exploded and forms a country of bristling spikes and gulfs and sharp edges very much like the wreck of a huge ginger beer bottle factory What are now farmhouses were the halls and mansions of families of noble descent Indeed the original settlers in Iceland were the nobles of Norway who left their native land to avoid the tyranny of Harold Fairhair who tried to crush their power so as to make himself a despotic king in the land
