

Teaching secondary biology

Michael J. Reiss and Mark Winterbottom

Abstract The third edition of the ASE's Teaching Secondary Biology sets out a vision for teaching and learning biology. Learning biology is not about learning the contents of a textbook. It is about conceptual learning, learning what it means to do biology and learning what it means to be a biologist. Our hope is that Teaching Secondary Biology helps teachers of biology to achieve these aims. The author team with whom we worked kept in mind a secondary teacher confronted with the task of teaching a specific topic, for example photosynthesis or evolution, and the preparation they would need to undertake. This article provides an overview of the book, which has sister volumes in chemistry and physics, and discusses ways in which teaching biology has much in common with teaching the other sciences, but is distinctive too.

In the third edition of the ASE's Teaching Secondary Biology (Reiss and Winterbottom, 2021), our aim as the two editors has been to help biology to be taught so that secondary students develop their conceptual understanding of the subject, are interested and inspired by it, and learn to connect ideas from different areas of biology.

The author team with whom we worked kept in mind a secondary teacher confronted with the task of teaching a specific topic, for example photosynthesis or evolution, and the preparation they would need to undertake. Some teachers will approach this task with a deep understanding of the topic. However, we kept in mind that not all teachers of secondary biology have a degree in the subject and that, even if they do, very few degrees cover all of secondary school biology. Indeed, excellent subject understanding is itself not enough for a teacher. For this reason, the chapters focus on how each topic might be taught so as to help students learn and to be inspired.

The third edition differs substantially from the second edition, which was published back in 2011. In part this is because of changes to the way the topics are now treated in secondary school biology. In part it is because of innovations in practical work and digital technologies. In part it is because of changes in thinking about the biology curriculum – including thinking that derives from the 'Big Ideas of Science' movement (Harlen et al., 2015).

Key concepts in biology

There are a number of key concepts in biology. Some are found in chemistry and physics too, such as the flow of energy and the circulation of materials. Many students find it difficult to understand that while both energy (the law of conservation of energy) and matter (the law of conservation of mass) are conserved, there is a fundamental asymmetry, in that energy continuously dissipates, whereas matter circulates: this is true whether we are thinking at the cellular or ecosystem scale.

Many key concepts are specific to biology, including:

- Reproduction. No individuals are immortal and so all organisms need to give rise to individuals in future generations.
- Heredity. In giving rise to the next generation, organisms may split into two (asexual reproduction) or produce specialised structures that enable either sexual or asexual reproduction.
- Evolution. Over the generations, organisms change. A key insight of Charles Darwin and some other biologists, notably his contemporary, Alfred Russel Wallace, was that natural selection is an inevitable consequence of: the overproduction of offspring; what we now call genetics; and the pressures exercised on organisms by the environment.
- Homeostasis. All organisms are able to regulate their internal environments to a very considerable degree – though this is more apparent in some (e.g. most mammals and birds) than in others.

Big ideas in biology

An influential pair of reports that link the big ideas of science to the science curriculum were produced by Wynne Harlen and colleagues (Harlen et al., 2010, 2015). In the 2010 report, Harlen and her colleagues came up with ten big ideas of science, of which four were of biology:

- Organisms are organised on a cellular basis.
- Organisms require a supply of energy and materials, for which they are often dependent on, or in competition with, other organisms.
