Understanding the Public Perception on Health Care Reform in the United States Hailey R. Kimball, 2012 American political thought suggests that people and Americans in particular act in an individualistic self interested manner this could explain why America is the only industrialized nation that does not have some form of universal healthcare system However contrary to normative theory empirical research suggests that Americans policy attitudes often reflect a concern for the general public rather than the individual With the recent passage of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act many polls show that Americans are largely divided with about half the population favoring the ACA and half opposing it This paper will examine public opinion to determine whether those who support the act and those who oppose it do so because of self interest or because of concern for the general public In addition because of the substantial amount of media coverage this topic has received we will examine the effect that the national television news has on a person s approval or disapproval of the ACA
