Wisconsin's Built Environment Bobbie Malone, Vivian Greblo, 1998-11-30 If buildings could talk they would tell us all about the people who built them maintained them or allowed them to deteriorate found new uses for them and inhabit them now Students can find out a great deal about Wisconsin history and the history of their local communities by studying the built environment Wisconsin's Built Environment introduces students to a selection of the structures that together tell some of our state's many stories It contains 22 pairs of photographs on separate perforated pieces of 8.5 x 11 inch card stock and a 68 page Teacher's Guide with background information and suggestions for classroom activities and student explorations This resource encourages students to get out into the local community and explore history through real life investigations

Built Environment and Children's Health in Wisconsin Milena Bernardinello, 2018 It is well established that the built environment is a social determinant of health Homes schools and their surroundings are the main built environment elements during childhood that shape how healthy children grow It is also recognized that physical fitness is as important as body weight for a healthy life style However only recently has evidence shown that the fit fat imbalance is one of the leading causes of child obesity also varying by age and ethnicity While the association of the built and food environment with body weight has been extensively studied the same association with level of fitness and their interaction has yet to be fully investigated This dissertation aims to 1 evaluate whether attributes of the built environments surrounding Latino children's homes are associated with their level of fitness controlling for BMI 2 investigate whether a composite measure of the built environment is related to prevalence of child obesity and 3 assess whether the school sites and their surroundings are associated with school level fitness Understanding these associations is necessary to institutionalize health in planning policies and planning practice such as school siting and to develop healthy and equitable communities Data come from University of Wisconsin School of Medicine and Public Health UW SMPH for 1 the 2010 HAPPY 2 project conducted in the city of Milwaukee 2 the Public Health Information Exchange PHINEX Electronic Health Records dataset years 2007-2012 for Dane County owned by the UW Family Medicine and Community Health and 3 the statewide Fitnessgram database jointly collected in 2009-2010 by the UW SMPH and the Wisconsin Department of Instruction Geospatial and non spatial multivariate linear regression are used to investigate the aims of this dissertation The main findings are 1 specific types of food retailers and parks within a certain distance from home are associated with children's aerobic fitness and that BMI mediates the association 2 the composite measure of the built environment is associated with child obesity prevalence and 3 typologies of school sites and specific types of food retailers surroundings schools are associated with school level fitness scores Implications for policy and practice in addition to further research are discussed Sites of Southern Wisconsin Lewis Koch, 1981 Historic Wisconsin Buildings Richard W.
