Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book without typos from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1847 edition. Excerpt: chapter xix the intelligence of man as distinguished from that of the brute. It has been very common with philosophers to represent all created existences from the highest Intelligences in heaven to the crude forms of matter as successive links in one great chain each link in the chain commencing with the lowest differing mainly in degree from that which immediately succeeds it. The highest forms of brute and the lowest of rational Intelligence for example differ it is asserted not in kind but only in degree. Of late the reality of orders of existences as successive links of a great chain has come to be seriously doubted. The intelligence of man and the brute it is said differs not in degree but in kind. If we conceive of the highest forms of brute intelligence increased to any degree whatever as far as degree is concerned still it makes no approach at all to real rationality. The different orders of brute instincts do constitute it is thought different links of one chain. Those of rational Intelligences constitute another and totally different chain a chain none of the links of which are connected in any form with any of those of the other. This last is the opinion entertained by the author of this Treatise. I will now proceed to state the grounds of this opinion. I will introduce what I have to say upon this subject by two extracts somewhat lengthy from Coleridge. In the first we have a classification of the different forms of brute Instinct in the second we are presented with two instances of Instinctive Intelligence in their highest manifestations. Brute Instincts classified. I. It is evident that A System of Intellectual Philosophy. Second edition
