

complete cross-referencing in the Committee on Safety of Medicines' records since 1980 means that several reports may relate to the same incident. Doctors too vary in their willingness or their appreciation of the need to report adverse reactions. In addition, to compare adverse reports for a particular drug the number of scripts issued for the drug in question needs to be known. At present this is based on a 3% sample of all prescriptions issued and does not take into account such factors as dosage, duration or patient's age.

There have been pleas from various sources for more rational prescribing of non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs in general practice.¹²⁻¹³ While the Committee on Safety of Medicines feels that ibuprofen¹ may possibly be less toxic than other non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs there is little clear-cut evidence on safety and efficacy when making comparisons among these drugs.

We know that certain patients are placed at considerable risk when a non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drug is prescribed and there are several points which general practitioners should take into account before initiating or continuing non-steroidal anti-inflammatory therapy:

1. Try simple analgesics first.
2. Start at the lowest dose.
3. Think twice before prescribing to an elderly patient.
4. Explain possible side effects to patients and warn them to stop the drug if they occur.
5. Take into account the patient's weight when considering the dose.
6. Counsel the patient on smoking and alcohol and provide dietary advice.
7. Monitor closely renal function and electrolyte balance in patients with cirrhosis, congestive heart failure, renal disease and gout.
8. Monitor blood pressure in all patients, especially known hypertensives, to detect any increase caused by non-steroidal anti-inflammatory therapy.
9. Avoid if possible prescribing to patients with recent peptic ulceration and prescribe with caution to patients with a history of indigestion or peptic ulceration in the past.
10. Do not issue repeat prescriptions to patients without regular assessments.

Of course, concern about the safety of this group of drugs needs to be balanced by an appreciation of the benefits which they provide. It was possible to restrict the use of phenylbutazone only when other less toxic anti-inflammatory drugs became available. Careful surveillance of existing and new anti-inflammatory drugs is required to establish which are the safest to prescribe and general practitioners can contribute to this process by reporting all adverse reactions to the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

Counsellors in general practice

IT is a characteristic of primary care that people seek help for problems that are physical, psychological and social, and often for a combination of two or three.

How much of general practice work is psychosocial is disputed, partly because of the problems of classification — what one doctor legitimately labels as dyspepsia another can code as depression. Nevertheless, it is clear that the minimum amount of work which is associated with emotional disturbance is about 7%, as this is recorded even by doctors who clearly tend to make organic diagnoses. Some practitioners believe that as many as 30% of the problems that they see are primarily emotional in origin.

Such problems include unhappy marriages, trouble at work, bereavement and unsatisfactory relationships. It was Balint¹ who first threw light on the nature of these problems and the need for general practitioners to be sensitive to them, and his work led to doctors looking more critically at their own skills and feelings and their ability to handle these feelings.

The Balint approach has greatly influenced the development of British general practice and it remains true that a vast number of patients can be substantially helped by general practitioners using skills that in the past were described as brief psychotherapy but which today are increasingly recognized as the skill of counselling. An editorial in the *Journal*² in 1980 suggested that counselling was an essential part of general practice and that the skills and techniques it required were specially suited to doctors working in the front line of medical care.

However, as doctors have become more aware of the need for counselling, so counsellors, often with origins as diverse as marriage guidance, psychiatry or social work, have been emerging as professionals in their own right with their own association, code of ethics and methods of work.
