

Drystone Walling

A good drystone wall may be a work of art and a joy to the eye, but its essential duty is to the farmer who needs to separate stock from crops.

Most walls in the Cheviot Hills were built in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries and have weathered well without very much maintenance. Until the 1950s gangs of lead labourers were available for summer work; farmers relied on them for many of the heavy tasks such as building or digging as well as harvesting crops, when there was never enough local hands.

Over recent years many drystone walls have fallen into disrepair and there has been no one left on the land with the skill or time to put things right. Craftsmen such as Tom Arnes make a steady living from correct walling, moving from farm to farm as work demands. Building a good wall is a skilled business, particularly in the Cheviots where most of the raw stone takes the form of rounded, indolite boulders rather than slabs of sandstone. It takes a ton of stone to make a yard of wall, and without 'through-stones' to bind the structure together it takes a man's touch to figure the heavy boulders into the right places. Tom's walls don't fall down.

A properly built drystone wall is about 1½ yards high and tapers from the base up the bank to the coping stones. A string line is set to guide the level from one end of a section to the next, and a wooden template and plumb line is placed at the end to help alignment. Three or four yards of wall are built in a day; walling is considered one of the most difficult jobs in agriculture, so there is pressure to complete the job as quickly as possible, but skilfully.

Landowners in the National Park receive grants which can amount to 75% of the cost of rebuilding a wall. Over the past six years only a dozen miles of crumbling walls have been dealt with in this way - a drop in the ocean considering the number built at the time of the enclosure and the impact they will have on the landscape.

Tom Arnes lives at Kelsie and has been a waller, or daker, for thirty years. He used sheepfencing once but didn't like it, and his son Mark took over the sheepfencing but soon returned to the family business. The son
