and use data Historical water records in Australia are discontinuous incomplete and often incongruently disaggregated We present a systematic method to produce a coherent reconstruction of the historical provision and consumption of water in Victorian catchments This is demonstrated using WAS an accounting and simulation tool that tracks the stocks and flows of physical quantities relating to the water system The WAS is also part of and informed by an integrated framework of stocks and flows calculators for simulating long term interactions between other sectors of the physical economy Both the WAS and related frameworks consider a wide scope of inputs regarding population land use energy and water The physical history of the water sector is reconstructed by integrating water data with these information sources using a data modeling process that resolves conflicts and deduces missing information The WAS allows strategic exploration of water and energy implications of scenarios of water sourcing treatment delivery and end use cognizant of historical records Author s abstract
