

HOW TO MEND NETS

Valuable Information For Every Sportsman
and Commercial Fisherman

HERE are a few tricks of the trade that are well worth having in handy reference form so that when the occasion arises you may mend a torn net or replace a whole section as the need may require. The commercial fisherman, of course, will find it of practical value to acquire this skill and even make a point of practicing various kinds of repair.

Notice the illustration titled "A Tear Before Trimming"—this shows a vertical and a horizontal tear. The first step in mending a tear is to cut off unnecessary tag ends, then cut enough more strands to satisfy the following requirements. (The second picture in this series shows the most convenient method of cutting twine.)

1. The end of the twine must start at a knot joining THREE strands or from a tag end leading from such a knot. The weaving must also end at a similar point. This is necessary because only one end of the mending twine is attached at the knots

(A) Making the knot.

(B) Cutting twine.
