

SCIENTIFIC METHOD: CONCEPT, ACTUALITY AND SOME THEORETICAL PROBLEMS THEREOF<sup>1</sup>

Juan Ramón Álvarez
Universidad de León

[107]

I. Preliminary remarks

The subject of this session of the course, in which the following considerations will be included, is the problem of the method, if any, of present-day science. The theoretical considerations on method can be placed under the general appellation of "methodology". We shall not lack occasion to note the carelessness with which this term is sometimes used. Nevertheless, I want now to refer only to the relationship between methodology and the philosophy of science, to point to the meeting place where the contributions of scientists and philosophers can be brought together. In the face of this representation, there are two possibilities. The first, that this intersection is empty, reflects the practically uncommon situation in which the philosophy of science is completely alien to any methodological consideration. The second, that this intersection is not empty, is threefold. One of its cases would be that in which methodology would include the philosophy of science by reducing it to reflect on the internal processes of the sciences (I do not stop to consider whether the philosophy of science would be reduced to the whole of methodology or only to a part thereof). A second case, in the extreme opposite, would be the one in which the philosophy of science would include the methodology of science by reducing it. Methodology would thus be characterized as an exclusively philosophical and non-scientific task. The remaining case -the most plausible one- is that in which there is an overlapping between the philosophy of science and methodology of science, these being irreducible among themselves.

Focusing on this third case, we can take the following easily sustainable positions.

1. Not the whole philosophy of science is methodology of science. There are aspects such as ontology, [108] epistemology, the history of science, etc., which, without being disconnected from methodology, are not methodological disciplines, nor are they reduced to methodology. Bunge (1972, p. 50) contrasts the methodology of science, which is concerned with the general method and the complementary techniques, with the philosophy of science, "which is concerned with the assumptions and results [...] logical, epistemological and methodological of scientific research" (See also Rivadulla 1984, p. 17, where the philosophy of science is identified with a special discipline
