

and Teaching, edited by Nancie Arwell and Thomas Newkirk, is a collection of essays written by practicing teachers in early-childhood and elementary contexts. The contributors detail particular assignments and classrooms-based pedagogies that incorporate writing. While the text itself is dated (the latest edition was published in 1987), the activities and experiences chronicled in the essays are easily adaptable to today's classrooms. The second book I selected, Peter Elbow's collection of essays Everyone Can Write, is the most traditional work of composition theory and pedagogy included on the syllabus. As most Composition Studies readers are aware, Elbow's appeal is located in his practical insistence to model theory as he proposes it. For example, in one of his essays, "Freewriting and the Problem of Wheat and Tares," nearly half of the essay is Elbow's own unedited freewriting that he completed to get started on that particular composition. In this way, Elbow offers novice compositionists a personal and low-stakes invitation to experiment with writing in practice. The third book I assigned is Anne Lamott's Bird by Bird, a collection of short essays about the craft of writing by a popular and experienced writer of fiction and nonfiction. Like Elbow, Lamott delivers her advice to writers via personal experience, but Lamott's often irreverent tone helps readers disassociate the kinds of standardized writing many of us experience in school from the kinds of writing professionals do for a living, or just for fun.

These texts, coupled with the assignments I designed for the course (discussed below), come together to present novice teachers of writing with an introduction to composition pedagogy that encourages them to cultivate a critical-pragmatic attitude toward the value of writing as both a pedagogical tool and an outlet for reflection and revision.

Critical Reflection

Without inflating the students' positive evaluations of the course, I believe this approach to English 341 was quite successful. Not only did the course productively engage the advanced composition/composition pedagogy split that I struggled to conceptualize the first couple of times I taught the course, but the students themselves also acknowledged this engagement in their course evaluations and in the retrospective essays I required them to compose at the end of the semester. From my perspective, most of this success was a result of the writing students completed in the course, all of which required them to balance their experienced identity as students with their emerging identity as teachers.

The first essay assignment, which is more or less a literacy narrative, asked students to connect specific moments from their experiences with school to an understanding of what it means to be a teacher. Titled the "Becoming a Teacher" essay, the assignment made explicit reference to Anne Lamott's con-
