with the Great War reducing northern Europe to a treeless shattered void a boy was born to the prosperous director of a pharmaceutical firm in Zurich He was named Werner It was not an auspicious time to be born and indeed his mother died soon after As a child young Werner sought order in his life by dissecting snails and photographing in the limpid light of his creation the elegant whorls revealed He did not become the physical training instructor his father wanted him to be He did not become the painter he had once wanted to be in Paris in 1939 on the brink of another devastating conflict He became Werner Bischof the man and a photographer of incalculable artistry who found in both order and the chaos he confronted and experienced a sublime beauty a humanity that was singularly his own His photographs of a post war Europe in poverty and despair expressed infinite hope for the human condition yet he was only 29 Less than 10 years later he was dead leaving behind among his last photographs that of a Peruvian child playing his flute on the edge of a ravine It is now an iconic photograph with a fatal allure Bischof himself died when his jeep plunged over a ravine in the Andes on a quest for the faces the lives of harmony there Fifty years later his son Marco has gathered together 70 previously unpublished photographs by Werner Bischof They powerfully reiterate the man his father was the nature of his humanity and his search for a benign and beautiful cognisance of the brief and terrifying world he lived in Werner Bischof Charles Rosner,1955

Werner Bischof Pictures Werner Bischof,2006 In his brief life Werner Bischof 1916 1954 travelled half the world to create the oeuvre that would seal his reputation as a master of classic black and white photography This book provides a comprehensive survey of the Swiss photographer's output straddling the divide between art and journalism His work in the nascent field of colour photography is also well represented Visiting southern Germany after the Second World War ended he was appalled at the sheer scale of the destruction and set about documenting Europe in the aftermath of war In those early days of photojournalism Bischof had his pictures published in the leading magazines of the western world and became a founding member of the legendary Magnum Photos group Bischof's 1951 photo essay on famine in India won him international acclaim His travels in Asia inspired a life long interest in the relationship between tradition and modernism culminating in the photographs of Japan Working in the war zones of Korea and Indochina Bischof became increasingly disillusioned by photojournalism and after two years in Asia he returned to Zurich In the autumn of 1953 he created expansively composed colour photographs in the USA He then travelled on to Central and South America in search of harmony between man and nature Werner Bischof was killed in a road accident in the Andes in 1954 BOOK JACKET
