Spanish Goals And Goal Setting:

Goal Setting and Its Influence on Achievement in the Spanish Language Classroom Alyssia Miller, 2018 The present study employs an interdisciplinary approach that bridges theories from second language acquisition education and psychology and centers on finding new techniques to help students learn In this study I examined goal orientations goal setting and the effects on achievement in beginning level Spanish language learners Firstly I defined language achievement as three fold consisting of final course grades intercultural competence and linguistic competence Then in nine sections of a beginning level Spanish course I employed five steps of goal setting a process that I have coined the 5 As They are articulation action assessment adherence and achievement Results show that in the main goal orientation categories which consist of mastery performance approach and avoidance mastery goals and approach goals were the most common The mastery approach goal orientation was the most common goal type when using a 2 x 2 framework which compares mastery approach mastery avoidance performance approach and performance avoidance Analysis of participants written goal statements showed communication speaking grammar and listening comprehension as the main areas that participants wanted to master in their Spanish course Considering the effects on achievement results indicate that students who followed this process of the 5 As and actively set goals had statistically significant higher final course grades as compared to the control group p 034 Further analysis of these results revealed a significant difference between the control group and the approach goal orientations p 020 In terms of intercultural competence development results suggest that students did not develop interculturally and this was independent of whether they set a goal or not Participants also did not believe that learning culture was a necessary part of language learning Regarding linguistic competence development there were statistically significant interactions but the main effects and post hoc analyses only revealed significance between the pre and posttest scores in the control group who significantly decreased p 050 and the pre and posttest scores in the avoidance group who significantly increased p 024 This study also demonstrates the positive benefits gleaned from the goal setting process These include increased attentiveness awareness engagement language learner autonomy motivation self efficacy and self regulation As such the results of this study can and should be implemented into the standards curricula and textbooks in order to have students become an active part of the learning process
