

THINKING THE PRESENT

RECENT AMERICAN ARCHITECTURE

Recent American architecture has not received the attention it deserves and needs in order to arrive at a positive understanding of its present. Despite the formidable dissemination of information, there has been a tendency to ignore the complex and shifting factors that definitively contribute to the actual production of architecture. Contemporary design has been seen as unrelated either to theoretical developments in other spheres of cultural production or to new conditions in politics and the economy. Thinking the Present is a collection of essays delivered to a recent conference at the Graduate School of Design at Harvard University that examines the consonances and disturbances of recent American architecture and attempts to revise the terms in which it is thought, articulated, and practiced. Although an imprecise line separates the recent past from the actual present, today's architectural
