Substantive Minority Representation in Parliament Lea Ewe Bönisch,2025-05-21 This book explores why members of parliament MPs substantively represent minorities with invisible characteristics those lacking outwardly recognizable features This invisibility complicates the representational relationship as minority members often do not publicly self identify leaving MPs unaware of their electorate s composition and citizens uninformed about MPs affiliations Studies on those minorities yield mixed results on the importance of minority membership for MPs legislative behaviour Analysing sexual minorities representation this work attempts to provide a clearer picture Moreover it looks at political values and awareness as additional explanatory factors Both parts a quantitative analysis of parliamentary questions and a comparative case study of legislative processes regarding same sex marriage reveal that minority membership significantly affects individual and macro level substantive representation with political values and awareness being at play too Overall this book adds conceptual theoretical and empirical insights to research on representation legislative studies and comparative politics in general Thereby this study provides important clues on how the integration of minority interests in liberal democracies can succeed
