

1. Introduction

What would it be like to have never learned English, but instead only to know Hopi, Mandarin Chinese, or American Sign Language? Would that change the way you think? Imagine entirely losing your language, as the result of stroke or trauma. You are aphasic, unable to speak or listen, read or write. What would your thoughts now be like? As the most extreme case, imagine having been raised without any language at all, as a wild child. What—if anything—would it be like to be such a person? Could you be smart; could you reminisce about the past, plan the future?

There is a common sense set of answers to these questions, one that represents the mainstream in many circles of cognitive science (see Pinker, 1994 for a lucid exposition). Under this view, the language you speak does not affect how you think. Rich, powerful and abstract cognition can take place within minds that, due to injury or deprivation, have no natural language. Even babies know about the kinds and individuals that occupy their world. They just don't know their names. Before being exposed to words in a language such as English, all humans possess the concepts that these words correspond to, as part of what Jerry Fodor (1975) calls 'mentalese' or 'a language of thought'. Under this view, as Fodor puts it, all language learning is actually second language learning—when a child learns the vocabulary of English, all that happens is that the child learns the mappings from the English words onto the symbols of this prior language of thought.

There is another perspective, however, one that is also rooted in common sense, and which is popular across many disciplines. Many linguists and anthropologists claim that the language one learns has a profound influence on how

Thinking Through Language :

Critical Thinking and Language Tim John Moore,2011-10-13 This book clarifies the idea of critical thinking by investigating the critical practices of academics across a range of disciplines Drawing on key theorists Wittgenstein Geertz Williams Halliday and using a textographic approach the book explores how the concept of critical thinking is understood by academics and also how it is constructed discursively in the texts and practices they employ in their teaching Critical thinking is one of the most widely discussed concepts in debates on university learning For many the idea of teaching students to be critical thinkers characterizes more than anything else the overriding purpose of higher education But whilst there is general agreement about its importance as an educational ideal there is surprisingly little agreement about what the concept means exactly Also at issue is how and what students need to be taught in order to be properly critical in their field This searching monograph seeks answers to these important questions Thinking Through the Language Arts Denise D.
