ABSTRACT

Background: "Sit to stand" being a prerequisite for walking, the inability of patients to perform it can result in institutionalization. Cognition and freezing of gait also impaired functioning and mobility in activities of daily living. There was a need to find out whether "sit to stand" ability correlates with cognition, and quality of life in Parkinson's patients.

Method: It was a cross sectional study in which thirty-three Hoehn & yhar stage 1,2, and 3 patients aged 50 to 70 years were included. Patients with musculoskeletal impairments of lower extremity which would affect walking were excluded from the study. Each patient performed five times sit to stand (5TSTS) from a chair and time taken was recorded. Mini mental scale was (MMS) taken for cognitive impairment. Freezing of gait questionnaire and Parkinson's disease activities of daily living scale (PDADLS) was also taken.

Result: Correlation between the outcomes of the variables was analysed using Pearson correlation co-efficient. The 5TSTS scores showed strong positive correlation to PDADLS and with MMS weak positive correlation. However, moderately positive relationship was found between freezing of gait and PDADLS.

Conclusion: The study concludes that change in the 5TSTS performance can affect motor functions and freezing gait like daily living activities of life but not any significant in cognitive functions. Exercise training focusing on sit-to-stand ability may also influence activities of daily living (ADLs) and freezing gait in Parkinson's patients.

INTRODUCTION

Parkinson's disease (PD) is a disorder of the central nervous system (CNS) which is progressive and has both motor and nonmotor symptoms. The cardinal motor symptoms include features of rigidity, bradykinesia, tremor and in later stages, postural instability. Constipation, Rapid eye movement (REM), sense of smell, sleep behaviour disorder, mood disorder, orthostatic hypotension are the early features of Parkinson's disease. The nonmotor symptoms include altered bladder function, excessive saliva, integumentary changes, difficulty speaking and swallowing, and cognitive problems (slowed thinking, confusion, and in some cases dementia) are included in non-motor early symptoms.<sup>1</sup>
