Proceedings ,2003 An Attachment Style Based Experimental Design to Maximize Dog Adoption Success Claire Weinman,2015 Evolution and domestication have brought dogs very close to humans Research has found numerous behavioral cognitive neurological and physiological similarities between the two species Additional research has found that humans and dogs can share cross species attachments that are comparable to mother infant attachments Furthermore attachment styles in dogs are classified the same way they are in children The statistics on the vast amount of dogs in animal shelters too many of which are being senselessly killed are shocking I propose a two part study that first assesses which attachment style pairings are most successful and which are unsuccessful based on measurements of satisfaction and oxytocin levels reflecting attachment The second study is designed to verify these pairings by manipulating adoptions and following pairs If particular pairings are found more successful than others and are utilized at adoption I hypothesize an attachment style based program would produce more successful adoptions lower the amount of dogs returned to shelters and eventually lower euthanization rates

The Impact of Breed Identification, Potential Adopter Perceptions and Demographics, and Dog Behavior on Shelter Dog Adoptability Yolonda F. Bradshaw, 2021

Annually approximately 6.5 million companion animals enter U.S. animal shelters nationwide 3.3 million are dogs Upon intake shelter personnel evaluate each dog to gain information regarding behavioral and health history Previous owner's records or shelter personnel's visual perception of the dog generates a breed label However the U.S. shelter canine population predominately consists of dogs with an unknown history and breed heritage thus the created breed label is a subjective assessment of breed type Several studies illustrate that majority of shelter dogs are composed of more than one breed and are mislabeled compared to identified breeds from their genetic analysis Additionally breed labels have negatively impacted adopters decisions due to certain breeds stereotypes and legislation Breed labeling is a tool animal shelters can utilize to implement specific care strategies and tailored adoption matches for the dogs in their care However canines are multidimensional individuals whose behavior and appearance are influenced by numerous factors therefore whether a breed label accurately reflects a dog's genetic makeup may not be efficient for successfully matching potential adopters with a companion By steadily increasing the number of successful adoptions out of the shelter fewer animals may require euthanasia

The overarching objective of this research was to assess the impact of removing dog breed labels in a local animal shelter on overall dog adoption rate and length of availability LOA for adoption in addition to dog breeds commonly restricted by breed legislation or currently under county restrictions in the state of Ohio The second objective examined the impact of visitors demographics perceptions and importance of potential companion's features on adoption decisions contingent on breed label presence or absence A third objective utilized dog behavioral observations during a visitor interaction to identify out of kennel shelter dog behaviors that may influence adoption outcome Through the utilization of experimental and observational methodologies a two phase survey instrument was distributed N=217 at a municipal animal shelter in Columbus Ohio over three 4 week periods P1 control breed labels on P2 treatment breed labels removed P3 return to control breed labels reimplemented Dog breed labels were assigned through visual inspection by shelter personnel They were visible to the public except for the treatment period's duration where they remained undisclosed in the shelter system software Furthermore a random subpopulation of participants consented to the dog's behavioral observation n=38 during their interaction A comprehensive out of kennel shelter dog ethogram was developed and employed to record and code dogs behavior Results concluded that breed label removal did not increase the overall dog adoption rate however after breed label reimplementation there was a 7.9% decrease in adoption rate compared to the initial control period Within each period the non bully breed group maintained a higher proportion of adoptions than the bully breed group After breed label reimplementation dogs in the bully breed group remained available for adoption approximately two days longer than bully breed dogs in the previous study periods Dogs in the bully breed group were available for adoption twice as long as dogs in the non bully breed group in each study period While subjective breed labels were removed fewer visitors viewed dog breed as a determining factor for adoption Shelter visitors often did not agree with breed assignments by shelter personnel irrespective of breed label presence Perceived and observed dog behaviors influenced adoption likelihood While previous research has focused on factors that influence shelter dog adoption in part the present study has offered a unique framework for exploring a more holistic approach to the multifaceted adoption process The examination of factors that influence adopters decisions before and after a shelter dog interaction by assessing adopters and nonadopters utilizing experimental and observational methodologies provides new insights into animal shelter research Furthermore it enhances our understanding of the shelter animal adoption process by identifying management recommendations that shelters could implement to increase shelter dog adoption success These findings also have the potential to transcend beyond animal shelters and adopters extending to property managers policymakers and the community at large
