Heads Up Victor Lavy, 2022 Literature has shown that air pollution can have short and long term adverse effects on physiological and cognitive performance leading to adverse outcomes in the labor market In this study we estimate the effect of increased nitrogen dioxide NO₂ one of the primary air pollutants on the likelihood of accidents in construction sites a significant factor related to productivity losses in the labor market Using data from all construction sites and pollution monitoring stations in Israel we find a strong and significant connection between air pollution and construction site accidents We find that a 10 ppb increase in NO₂ levels increases the likelihood of an accident by as much as 25 percent We observe strong nonlinear treatment effects mainly driven by very high levels of NO₂ The probability of an accident is almost quadrupled when NO₂ levels cross into levels considered by the EPA as unhealthy above the 99th percentile in our sample compared to levels considered clean below the 95th percentile in our sample We also implement a set of instrumental variable analyses to support the causal interpretation of the results and present evidence suggestive of a mechanism where the effect of pollution is exacerbated in conditions with high cognitive strain or worker fatigue Finally we perform a cost benefit analysis supported by a nonparametric estimation and institutional information which examines the viability of a potential welfare improving policy to subsidize the closure of construction sites on highly polluted days
