

The opening of the Stockton to Darlington Railway in 1825 is being celebrated 200 years later. The birth of the railways led to changes throughout Britain and provided convenient transport for the masses. Britain's railway network grew rapidly and as time moved on steam was replaced by diesel and electric trains. Trains became faster with well-known names such as the Flying Scotsman and the Cornish Riviera Express. Then, following the infamous Beeching Report, there was a decline and many lines and stations closed. Despite this, Britain's railways today carry millions of passengers.

John Parkin looks at the development of the railways over these 200 years with an illustrated talk which will include many archive scenes from the Greater London area.
