Lingua Franca ,1994     The Wired Neighborhood Stephen Doheny-Farina,1996-01-01

Are communication technologies ushering in a wondrous new age of computer networks that connect people into worldwide virtual communities of like minded individuals Or are global computer networks isolating us from real relationships and from our society as we stare into a screen instead of interacting face to face In this eloquent and thoughtful book Stephen Doheny Farina explores the nature of cyberspace and the increasing virtualization of everyday life He occupies a middle ground between these two extreme views of the net arguing that electronic neighborhoods should be less important than geophysical neighborhoods in all their integrity and that we must use the new technologies not to escape from our troubled communities but to reinvigorate them Doheny Farina offers a critical perspective on virtual reality and its social impact showing us how people meet and converse on the net how they teach and learn and how they establish workplaces that can accompany them wherever they go Along the way he reveals the advantages and hazards of making the computer the center of our public and private lives Doheny Farina argues that once we begin to divorce ourselves from geographic place and start investing ourselves in virtual communities we further the dissolution of our real dying communities He speaks out in favor of a movement called civic networking which promotes the proliferation of networks that originate locally to organize community information and culture and to foster pride in and responsibility to our neighborhoods
