In this final volume of the trilogy on the theme of adventure begun with The Robinson Crusoe Story and Seven Types of Adventure Tale Martin Green argues that Western civilization and culture have been inspired and characterized by the idea of adventure as much as by more famous ideas like democracy and justice Green explores the dimensions of both individual and group or political forms of adventure uncovering the presence of the adventure idea and tracing its influence in various kinds of cultural activity and ideology from exploration sports and nationalistic activity to philosophy politics science and economics In most cases he finds a cult of energy risk and heroism that answers to the excitement of those stories defined as adventures Moreover he demonstrates that the cult is linked to masculinity and certain virtues associated with men rather than women The Adventurous Male will augment ongoing discussion and debate in the realms of both feminism and the men's movement
