In the troubled thirties, this book was a call to radical revolution, a rousing "Christian Manifesto" that earned for him from his Catholic critics the title of "le chrétien rouge", the Red Christian. What Maritain's critics refused to understand, in particular those Christians who, as Maritain put it, were "furiously attached to their privileges," whether ecclesiastical or economic privileges, was that the radical revolution to which Maritain was inciting Christians was not the violent overthrow of this or that political regime, nor the imposition of some "concrete historical ideal" or "utopia" realized through the forceful application of five, ten, or twenty year plans, and the ostracism or expulsion of all those who refuse, in whole or in part, a particular realization of this ideal. Rather, the revolution Maritain called for consisted of a gradual but radical "transformation of the temporal order," not imposed from above, but carried out from within, from the bottom up, by revolutionaries among whom "it would be vain to look for unanimous accord," but who would be in agreement on certain universal principles which are "capable of descending to concrete realizations" and on a "general plan which is truly precise and practical."
