ABSTRACT

Political and Social scientists, since the end of the 20th century, have been concerned about youth's "withdrawal" from participating in public life. This paper addresses the issue of teaching Civic Education and presents new didactic and interactive tools that can be used in the educational process. Introducing the meaning of Democracy to students takes place in compulsory education but during Secondary Education is taught extensively with the aim of creating responsible and interactive citizens. Therefore, students are exercised in democratic procedures during courses, interactive learning and by electing students' board into school premises in order to motivate political participation and political understanding. However, an individual is not considered as a citizen only on the election day. To this end, thematic workshops were designed and implemented by using the principle of deliberation in schools in the area of Thessaloniki (Greece), in the context of the course "Contemporary World, Citizen and Democracy" in Secondary Education. The workshops focused on the familiarization with the Greek and European Parliament functions into the school communities by interactive and experiential learning. At the end of this approach, a survey was conducted to students concerning their opinion about deliberation and electoral procedures. In that terms, we aim to develop a structured and interactive Civic Education curriculum that will help shape active and responsible citizens. Our teaching practice is based on mathematical skills and statistical concepts to cultivate further the concepts of democracy and representation.

INTRODUCTION

Political and Social scientists, since the end of the 20th century have been concerned about youth's "withdrawal" from participating in public life (due to limited interest and poor participation in electoral policies), their democratic responsiveness (Jacobs and Shapiro, 2000) and their rejection of traditional means of civic and political collective actions. This issue has been discussed worldwide and many interventions had been made in this perspective. Thereby, it is vital to design a pedagogy of Political Science that aims to high level of civic and political engagement in schools. This paper addresses the issue of teaching Democracy in schools, specifies the used teaching tools and introduces new methods that could be implemented in the educational process. The aim is to cultivate the fundamental principles of Democracy and analyze the competences of the basic institutions. Introducing the meaning of Democracy to students takes place in compulsory education, but during Secondary Education is taught extensively in order to create responsible and interactive citizens. Besides lecturing, the teaching tools that can be used are additional activities focused on the familiarization with the Parliament functions into the school communities by interactive and experiential learning. In that terms, we designed workshops which "integrate" and "implement" the democratic principles, the representative system, the electorate and deliberation.

The concept of representation, the role of the representative (i.e. study of ballot forms, party-lists, ranked ballots, first-past-the-post systems), the electoral system (i.e. the proportional system, first-past-the-post voting, two-round system, ranked voting or mixed systems- in the case of Greece) and the electorate's voting criteria are the most important issues for an effective democratic system (Chadjipadelis & Sotiroglou, 2018). An individual is not considered as a citizen only on the election day. In the book "Deliberation in the classroom: Fostering Critical Thinking, Community, and Citizenship in Schools" teachers stated that the educational system does not provide the adequate knowledge (Molnar-Main, 2017) so as students to become active citizens (Chadjipadelis & Sotiroglou, 2017). The goal is to prepare students for real life and citizenship. The purpose of our approach is to relate the aforementioned issues to the school / student community, which is an introductory in state organization and governance. Students, like citizens, elect representatives for their student councils. Thus, appointing delegates to the fifteen-member students' councils, acts as a simulation of the electoral process and the democratic principle of representation. This paper proposes new teaching methods to encourage and motivate students to become active citizens with the skills of responsibility, social solidarity and collective action. The secondary aim is to promote statistical thinking and statistics in order to
