Abstract

After the disintegration of the USSR, Russia confronted the task of reforming its border security policy, which had previously emphasized stringent control over both inbound and outbound cross-border movements. This challenge was further compounded by the unprecedented management of 13 thousand kilometers of newly established borders with other states of the former Soviet Union. This article examines the evolving trends in Russian border security policy, encompassing the management of these new borders, endeavors to integrate Russia's border security spaces with those of its post-Soviet allies, and the impacts of geopolitical expansionism. On the other hand, the scope of issues covered by Russia's border security agenda remains extensive, encompassing geopolitical fears and other issues that cannot be managed effectively by the agencies tasked with routine border management.

Keywords: Russia, border security, geopolitics, securitization, seclusion.

La transformación de la política de seguridad fronteriza rusa ha dado resultados mixtos. Por un lado, Rusia ha adoptado efi-
