Velocity Management: The Business Paradigm That Has Transformed U.S. Army Logistics ,2001 Since 1995 the Army s Velocity Management VM initiative has brought a new way of doing business to U S Army logistics As the term Velocity Management implies this initiative focuses on improving the speed and accuracy with which materials and information flow from providers to users As a result of the VM initiative key Army logistics processes have improved dramatically in terms of time quality and cost Velocity Management was developed as an alternative to the Army s traditional mass based approach to logistics under which vast quantities of supplies spare parts fuel tanks extra vehicles ammunition and so forth are kept on hand just in case they are needed This approach was limited in responsiveness reliability and efficiency The existence of massive stockpiles of supplies does not ensure that combat forces will get what they need when they need it and mass requires a great deal of manpower and resources to manage and control Moreover mass based logistics poses a tremendous cost to the warfighter in terms of footprint risk and mobility

Microworld Simulations for Command and Control Training of Theater Logistics and Support Staffs John Bondanella,1999 This report discusses changes in training structure content and methods with the focus on developing training for CSS staffs operating as staffs not for individual training The focus is on large unit staffs corps and echelons above corps headquarters and support commands The document discusses shortcomings of the current approach to CSS staff training and then proposes a process oriented approach It illustrates how microworld models can be used to train CSS processes It then goes on to describe how pilot testing of prototype models indicates that this approach is feasible for large unit staffs It concludes with a proposed training strategy that the authors believe is more appropriate and useful for meeting the challenges posed to the Army by personnel turbulence split based operations increased reliance on information and decreased training resources The authors believe this approach has applications beyond the CSS training environment They argue that the microworld models in a carefully designed training strategy are appropriate to any business that needs to train staff under distributed conditions in uncertain environments and to avoid time and resource intensive costs of bringing staff together for a large game in a central location
