1. Introduction

The beginning of the story is where the main character or characters are introduced, the environment is explained, and the conflict is implied.

For instance, the main character Ana might have recently moved to Ireland and be working on her first book. We first meet the main character there, learn that she is in a foreign nation, and follow her as she struggles to overcome the difficulties brought on by each of these novel features.

2. Rising Action

We observe a sequence of incidents take place as the action picks up. If everything goes as planned and there are no hiccups, there isn't much of a narrative. We require some confrontation.

Conflict can take many different shapes. Keeping with Ana, it's possible that she's going through some sort of internal turmoil. She could start to question her choice to go so far away from her family. Or maybe she submits her book to her agency, and it gets ripped to pieces.

3. Climax

The climax of the action occurs at the story's climax. Now that the main character has encountered the action or conflict, something significant needs to come to a head.

Maybe Ana meets someone new who adopts a maternal role, which allays her concerns about relocating so far from home. She might submit the updated copy of her book and have it approved. Perhaps she informs the mighty lad of her disaster so she can concentrate on her book.

4. Falling Action

We observe things beginning to slow down in the falling action.

By this point, Ana and her new motherly acquaintance may have established a regular routine for Sunday dinners. Perhaps the advanced copy of her book is all she's waiting on. Perhaps the mighty lad has made a comeback and they are now a committed couple.

5. Resolution

Any story should have a satisfying closure at the end, known as the denouement. Here, the story's conclusion is revealed. Particularly for short works, a clear conclusion is necessary. But books can sometimes be left with some unfinished business. However, you must conclude the narrative with a nod or happy conclusion.

The experience of a final resolution is what readers seek.
