This thin volume serves as the catalogue for an art exhibition organized by University of Minnesota art history professor Robert Silberman in collaboration with the curator of the Frederick R. Weisman Art Museum, Patricia McDonnell. The exhibition, World Views: Maps & Art appeared at the Weisman, in the city of Minneapolis, between September 11, 1999 and January 2, 2000. The book includes two essays, one by Silberman and the other by Yi-Pa Tuan, emeritus professor of geography at the University of Wisconsin—Madison. Beyond these two essays, the book appeals mainly for the number of high quality images it contains. These include photographs of the art works from the exhibition, and the many excellent reproductions of maps important to the historical lineage of cartography (especially those in the Western tradition), most of which appeared in the exhibition. The exhibition included works by 18 artists or artist groups, including Jasper Johns, Claes Oldenburg, and Joseph Cornell. Three of the 18 artists (Mel Chin, Laura Kurgan, and Ilya Kabakov) were commissioned to produce installation works specifically for World Views: Maps & Art.

Maps impressively reproduced within the catalogue include Albino de Canepa's Portolan Chart of 1489, Martin Waldseemüller's Map of the World as Taylor Goes for a Globe of 1507, and Gerhard Mercator's Description of the Northern Lands of 1595, all of which appeared in the exhibition. Beautiful photographs of art works that appeared in the World Views: Maps & Art include Mappe del Mondo (1978) by Alighiero e Boetti, Magallanes en la confusión encontrada en océano (1994) by Miguel Angel Ríos, and United Shapes of America III (1994) by Kim Dingle. Other full-color images in the catalogue provide context for the exhibition by recalling other works of art that have taken cartography as their subject, such as Sphere of Influence (1990-92) by Mike and Doug Starn, and The New Ring Show (1995) by Houston Conwill, Joseph DePace, and Estella Conwill Majors. All these images listed above appear in color; about half of all images in the book appear in black and white.

The book also includes statements written by the three artists asked to produce works specifically for this exhibition: Mel Chin (of the "Knowmad Confederacy"), Laura Kurgan, and Ilya Kabakov. These three artists were commissioned to produce art works "that would relate to maps and mapping and that would be appropriate for the millennial moment" writes the exhibition's curator, Robert Silberman. Of course, all three artists were previously known for working within the subject of mapping. It is never made clear, however, why these three artists (as opposed to any of the many other artists who work with mapping) were asked to create works for this show, or how these works relate to the other art works and maps presented in the exhibition.

Chin's work is actually a group work, which he initiates, directing his concept as then carried-out by a number of computer experts who Chin assembled for the task. The group calls themselves the "Knowmad Confederacy," and includes Rocco Basile, Emil Basse, Tom Hambleton, Brett Hawkins, Andrew Lunstad, Chris Parrish-Taylor, Jane Powers, and Orla Thomason-Kuster. The work produced for the exhibition is titled Knowmad, the focus of which was, apparently, a video game about place that museum-goers could play. Unfortunately, neither the photographs of the installation, the description of the work by Robert Silberman, nor the artists' statement make very clear what the work of art actually consisted of as an object. Silberman refers to Chin's interest in the process of weaving rugs in Middle Eastern civilizations, then says Chin finally decided on a video game as the "focus" of Knowmad. What Knowmad consisted of beyond the video game is unclear. Silberman discusses these woven rugs in the Middle East as being important cultural objects full of significant meanings, and the video game appears to incorporate these designs. Yet, if the work is truly about place, as Chin and Silberman both suggest it is, it would make sense to be more specific in this book about exactly where these designs came from rather than simply attribute them to a civilization roughly defined as "Middle Eastern." Silberman states that, in this work, "art and popular culture are deployed to raise consciousness through a lively experience," but it is quite unclear as to what important issue the audience is supposedly being made conscious, or what they are supposed to do once they have become enlightened. The artists' statement discusses the disappearing world of these tribal weavers, vanishing rapidly "due to a complex series of political and cultural changes." Still, how is the audience sup-

World Views Robert Bruce Silberman, Yi-fu Tuan, 1999 An original look at the intersection of map making and artistic creation While many modern artists have been fascinated by the formal richness the conceptual foundations and the social significance of maps cartographers have long used the techniques of artists to create maps that express much more than how to get from one place to another World Views is the companion volume to an exhibition at the Frederick R Weisman Art Museum that is the first to combine maps contemporary art that uses map forms and strategies and commissioned works of art based on the idea of map making Densely illustrated with full color reproductions World Views shows how maps are a vehicle for examining cultural issues ranging from personal identity to international politics Maps from around the world and throughout history along with works by artists such as Jasper Johns and Nancy Graves are joined by art created especially for the exhibition Although maps are supposedly objective they incorporate cultural values and political beliefs Essays by Robert Silberman and eminent geographer Yi Fu Tuan explore further the complex relationship between the changing world map making and art
