

THE WORLD'S MOST INFAMOUS MURDER

It was just one week before the Ripper struck again. He got down. When found in Hanbury Street by a porter from nearby Market, her few personal possessions had been neatly laid out disembowelled corpse.

The next victim was Elizabeth 'Long Liz' Siddle. On the evening of 30 September, a police constable spotted a white-necked bird flying from a factory gate. Unlike earlier cases, Elizabeth Siddle's body had mutilated - which led police to surmise that the Ripper had been doing his grisly task. But, to satisfy his bloodlust, he soon found another victim was during this killing that he left the only clue to his identity.

Just 13 minutes walk from the spot where Long Liz's body had been discovered the bloody remains of 40-year-old Catherine Edmunds was the most terribly mutilated of 40-year-old Catherine Edmunds' ears. And from the corpse a trail of blood led to a message scratched into the wall. 'The Jews are not men to be blamed for nothing.' But the real evidence was never studied properly. Sir Charles Warren, head of the Metropolitan Police, perhaps leaving a violent backlash of hatred against Jews, ordered the slugs to be rubbed out and kept a secret.

Rumours now began to sweep like wildfire through the slums of London's East End. . . . The Ripper carried his instruments of death in a little black bag - and never rested except any innocent person carrying such a bag. He was a foreign woman - and anyone with a strong aversion went in fear of opening his mouth for fear of being an open Jewish butcher - and latent anti-Semitism already simmering because of influx of Jewish immigrants fleeing the Russian and Polish pogroms before bubbling to the surface.

An even wilder theory, popular in the most squalid areas where there were love lost between the inhabitants and the police, was that the killer was a policeman. How else would he be able to proceed the streets at night without creating suspicion?

The killer was in turn thought to be a mad doctor, a homicidal Russian or by the Czar's secret police trying to cause unrest in London, a pariah chased with cleansing the East End of vice, and a crazed madman with a hatred of prostitutes.

On 9 November, the Ripper struck again. Mary Kelly was unlike any of the other victims. She was pregnant - only 25, blonde and she was attractive. Her last person to see her alive was George Hutchinson whom she had asked for money to pay her rent. When he said he could not help she approached a well-dressed man with a trim moustache and a deerstalker hat. She was was screaming, Henry Bowyer knocked impatiently at her door for his wife. Finally he went to the window of Mary's room and pushed aside the curtains. The sickening sight which made him forget all about the wife was now staring for the police. Later, he was to say: 'I shall be glad to die for the rest of my life.'

When Kelly's death, the Ripper's reign ended as suddenly and completely as it began.

Several men were claimed to be the Ripper. One, who pointed his finger at John William Pritchard, claimed to be the Ripper.
