Abstract: Existing initiatives in mathematics education demand establishing a continuous professional development program for teachers in Ethiopian schools. However, implementing such programs first requires an understanding of the school and district environment in which the participating teachers work, as mathematics instruction is in part a function of the environment. In many cases, school and district settings are dynamic, and it is difficult to incorporate unplanned and intervening factors into the change process. This case study attempts to investigate the influences of the school and district settings in promoting reform visions in mathematics education. This study applies the theory of communities of practice as a framework and qualitative coding of data to understand the dynamic school setting and its implications for the teaching practices of mathematics teachers. The findings reveal that the school setting does not adequately promote reform visions, but rather it maintains the practice that is supposed to be changed. The current situation includes an accountability system loosely connected to reform visions, the absence of reform-oriented school leaders and expertise to guide the teachers, and a lack of instructional materials that the teachers can refer to regarding the new reforms. This paper suggests a possible configuration of the school situation to promote an environment that fosters the teaching of mathematics toward reform objectives.

1. Introduction

Like many developing countries, the Ethiopian Ministry of Education (MOE) has been introducing different reforms to improve the low quality of education in the country [1,2]. The reforms set ambitious standards and goals for students' learning [3]. Concerning mathematics education, these reforms entail shifts of focus from mathematical procedures to mathematical reasoning and understanding. These shifts demand that mathematics teachers change their teaching paradigm from a teacher-centered approach to an activity-based and student-centered approach. The Curriculum Framework for Ethiopian Education: KG—Grade 12 [3] clearly articulates that teachers should use a variety of teaching and learning methodologies so that students are given opportunities to question, verify and practice what they learn. Globally, such kinds of changes are complex and demanding for teachers. They require sustained professional support for teachers [4,5]. The case in Ethiopia could even be worse because of several factors that include the teacher-dominated schooling experience of the teachers, poor pre-service teacher education and the absence of sustained professional development opportunities at the school level [6,7].

The pre-service teacher education programs in Ethiopia are characterized by content mismatch with the school curriculum [7,8]; the lack of emphasis on pedagogical content knowledge (PCK) and the separate treatment of content and pedagogy [9,10]; the lack of
