mouth and never touch his brain at all Years ago pupils clasped hands swayed back and forth and recited their lessons in unison This plan allowed a few leaders to do all the work and kept the slow ones from learning anything This variety of poor teaching has been largely laid aside but it still survives in school music and its survival explains the poor results so often apparent in our public schools The necessity for individual work in music has long been recognized and many schemes have been tried to meet this demand When pupils do too much individual work they will not sing well together and when they do too little they will not read music well In this as in all other things there is the happy medium to be sought difficulties of individual work It is sometimes difficult to get children to sing alone This depends however on the way individual singing is presented Children realize the importance of doing things for themselves and they will gladly sing alone if individual work is put before them in
