Transcending Linearity in Understanding Green Consumer Behaviour: A Social–Cognitive Framework for Behaviour Changes in an Emerging Economy Context

Abstract: Awareness and understanding of green consumer behaviour (GCB) in emerging economies can increase consumer participation in green initiatives, leading to better product and behavioural choices and protecting scarce resources. Therefore, consumers should actively change their daily habits, lifestyle, and behaviour choices. A transdisciplinary critical realism approach can complement current knowledge on green consumer behaviour theories, which can layer behaviour change as a circular feedback process. Our approach could surpass linearity and rational decision-making—embracing the power of sustainable daily habits. We reviewed green consumer behaviour theories and identified the social cognitive theory (SCT) to support our approach. Hence, we employed an integrative review of applied SCT and green consumer behaviour. Findings suggest GCB as a reciprocal process with behaviour not only the outcome but an integral part of the process, as are personal and external determinants, existing in laminated layers of meaning that transcend the obvious. Finally, we propose a novel adapted framework that considers critical constructs that warrant investigation of an emerging economy context to identify consumers' challenges that impede behavioural change. Recommendations include segmenting consumers through pro-environmental self-identity, consumer personalities, and daily habits, which can help target consumers with appropriate messages and interventions to encourage greener lifestyles.

1. Introduction

Anthropogenic forces, including individual and collective human activity, contribute to the depletion of natural resources, climate change and global warming, consequently threatening human well-being and ultimate survival [1]. Human activity is thus central to the pursuit of sustainable development [2]. The sustainable development goals (SDGs) set by the United Nations (UN) underscore the balance between managing economic growth and preserving natural resources [3]. The SDGs require decisive action by all countries to drive green economies [4]. Global green economies are measured by the green economy performance of countries using the Global Green Economy Index (GGEI) measures across 18 indicators [5]. These indicators are contained within four dimensions: Climate Change and Social Equity, Sector Decarbonization, Markets and ESG Investment, and Environmental Health [5]. Of the 160 countries measured, the high-ranking green economies are mainly from developed countries (Sweden, Switzerland, Norway). In contrast, emerging economies rank much lower, such as South Africa at 152 and India at 144 [5].
