Poskanzer, 2025-11-18 An analysis and guide on when institutions should take stances on public issues Universities and colleges face increasing pressure to speak out on today's most contentious political moral and social issues But when should an institution of higher learning take a stand and when is silence the wiser choice In The University's Voice Steven G Poskanzer offers a timely and practical guide for institutional leaders grappling with these high stakes questions With decades of experience as a college president Poskanzer examines the growing demands for universities to take official positions on matters ranging from climate change to global conflicts to current debates over public policy He argues that universities must be faithful to and focused upon their core mission advancing knowledge and learning while carefully navigating the fragile social compact between academia and broader society At the heart of his argument is the General Rule of Reticence a principle that universities should be circumspect about adopting institutional positions unless doing so is essential to the pursuit of their mission including safeguarding academic freedom But reticence does not mean cowed silence Poskanzer outlines clear actionable criteria for when universities can and even must speak out when they possess unique educational expertise to offer when speech will ensure a robust intellectual environment for faculty and students when their mission is at issue or when their very existence is at risk This nuanced framework encourages academic leaders to respond thoughtfully to internal and external pressures to take stances without compromising the long term integrity of their institutions The University's Voice offers essential guidance for faculty and administrators as well as leaders of other mission
