White Supremacy Groups Bryan B. Sopko, 2008 The motives and actions of White Supremacy groups hold many similarities to terrorist Organizations in other parts of the world and with current U S policy that focuses on Islamic groups an increased opportunity exists for white supremacist groups to conduct acts of domestic terrorism and future attacks should be expected Individuals involved with the white supremacist movements continue to promote an ideology of hate and subsequently use the protection provided under the First Amendment to do so without fear of prosecution The greatest threat from these groups come from individuals acting as lone wolves in order to independently plan and conduct domestic terrorism in support of their beliefs The ability to interdict lone wolves is the largest challenge facing law enforcement at all levels The focus on groups associated with the attacks on September 11 2001 has drawn attention away for the white supremacist movement and the threat they pose Elected government officials and law enforcement agencies possess the ability to allocate resources to meet the potential domestic terrorist threat Understanding that this threat is real must happen in order to begin the intervention
