If the center of the United States is basically a melting pot of European nations, then, by comparison, the cuisine of Polynesia is a confluence of numerous ethnic influences, including its own. Among these influences are the vibrant colors and textures of tropical fruits, the rich, creamy textures of coconut milk, the tender, succulent textures of fish, and the hearty textures of breads and pastas. These influences, combined with the local ingredients, create a unique and delicious cuisine. The Polynesian diet is a mix of traditional and modern influences, with a focus on fresh, local ingredients. The cuisine is a blend of flavors and textures, with a focus on the natural tastes of the ingredients.
