

Theological Interpretations of Caribbean Society (1500–1530): Justifying Conquest and Redefining Humanity

Introduction: The Conquest of Souls and Lands

The Spanish conquest of the Caribbean between 1500 and 1530 unfolded not only through physical domination but also through intellectual and theological frameworks that sought to make sense of the newly encountered Indigenous populations. As Spanish explorers, missionaries, and scholars attempted to classify and justify their actions toward Native peoples, theology served as a powerful tool. It provided the moral rationale for colonization, forced conversion, and enslavement, and helped redefine the very idea of what it meant to be human in a Christian world.

The discourse surrounding the Indigenous Caribbean societies was shaped significantly by theological arguments about the soul, reason, and salvation. These arguments ultimately contributed to a reconfiguration of ethical boundaries. This essay explores the centrality of theological thought in interpreting Caribbean society during the early decades of Spanish expansion, drawing upon the works of Claudia Alvares, Malcolm Heath, and Anthony Pagden to understand how religious reasoning intersected with ethnographic observation and political ambition.

Early Encounters and The Crisis of Understanding

The initial encounters between Spaniards and the peoples of the Caribbean—particularly the Taino and other Arawakan-speaking groups—provoked widespread debate in Spain regarding the moral and spiritual status of the Indigenous. These societies, unfamiliar to European norms, were perceived as lacking many of the hallmarks of what Europeans considered civilization: centralized government, Christian belief, and written language.

In Christopher Columbus's letters and in the reports of missionaries such as Ramón Pané, there is both admiration for the perceived innocence of the Taino and concern over their idolatrous practices. The Spaniards were troubled by the absence of Christian worship, especially the Eucharist and knowledge of the Christian God. Their questions were theological in nature: Could a people who knew nothing of Christ be saved? If they worshipped false gods, were they culpable?

In response, theologians and philosophers turned to religious texts and classical authorities to assess whether these people were truly human, possessed rational souls, and were eligible for salvation. The implications of these assessments were significant. If the Indigenous were rational beings capable of conversion, they had to be treated with a
