

BEEETLES

by Robert Bloch

When Hartley returned from Egypt, his friends said he had changed. The specific nature of that change was difficult to detect, for none of his acquaintances got more than a casual glimpse of him. He dropped around to the club just once, and then retired to the seclusion of his apartment. His manner was as definitely hostile, so markedly anti-social, that very few of his cronies cared to visit him, and the occasional callers were not received.

It caused considerable talk at the time — gossip rather. Those who remembered Arthur Hartley in the days before his expedition abroad were naturally quite put up over the drastic metamorphosis in his manner. Hartley had been known as a keen scholar, a singularly erudite field-worker in his chosen profession of archeology; but at the same time he had been a peculiarly charming person. He had the worldly flair usually associated with the fictional characters of E. Phillips Oppenheim, and a positively devilish sense of humor which mocked and belittled it. He was the kind of fellow who could order the precise wine at the proper moment, at the same time grinning as though he were as much surprised by it all as his guest of the evening. And most of his friends found this air of culture without ostentation quite engaging. He had carried this urbane sense of the ridiculous over into his work; and while it was known that he was very much interested in archeology, and a notable figure in the field, he inevitably referred to his studies as "jotting around with old fossils and the old fossils that discovered them." Consequently, his curious reversal following his trip came as a surprise.

All that was definitely known was that he had spent some months on his trip to the Egyptian desert, and on his return he had become a man who associated with the most exclusive circles during the expedition. He had excited conjecture among his friends, but something about the period, it was understood, had changed that. He had come to grips with the world.

Hartley was one of those men who usually made an entrance in the sense of the word. He was a figure, attired in the manner of a dress so seldom found upon the pages of melodramatic fiction. He had a lionine head with its mane of bristle of gray hair, that commanded attention. He passed anywhere as a man of importance or a stage magician awaiting to step onto the platform.

But this evening he returned unobtrusively. He wore dark clothing, but his shoulders sagged, and he was gone from his walk. His hair was grayer, and it hung pathetically over his forehead. Despite the tanned Egyptian sun on his features, there was a sickly tinge to his complexion. His eyes peered mistily from under their slightly folds. His face seemed to have its mold; the mouth hung loosely.

He greeted no one, and took his seat alone. Of course cronies came and chatted, but he did not invite them. And oddly enough, none of them insisted, although normally they Pulps continued publishing Howard material posthumously and his first hardcover book appeared in 1937 a year after his death. That book A Gent from Bear Creek is considered the holy grail of Howard collectors; only seven original copies are known to exist. With the dust jacket, the book's value is estimated at 30,000. This guide is an invaluable resource for Howard collectors with information for every known published work. Initial chapters provide a biography, discuss Howard's literary legacy, and give basic tips about book collecting, grading, buying, and selling. The main body of the work is a bibliography of Howard's published works from 1925 through 2004. Each entry includes a description and known details including publisher, date, print run, and estimated value. A thorough index locates the publication of every Howard story or poem.
