
position that the magazines' signs do not encode a single mythic social identity. Chapter 4, 'Newspapers', investigates the relationship between linguistic and visual signs, using the front pages of two British newspapers for analysis. The next three chapters focus on various facets of television. Chapter 5, 'Television News', looks at how the signs and codes of broadcast news shape the meaning of reality. In Chapter 6, 'Television Realisms', Bignell examines the 'languages of realism' (p. 132) found in factual programs, stressing the multiple versions of reality that the careful construction of these shows makes possible. Chapter 7, 'Television Fictions', looks at how audience reception complicates and problematises semiotic discourse. Cinema is the focus of Chapter 8 and Bignell acknowledges his brief approach to a complex subject. Returning to psychoanalytic theory, he discusses subjectivity and spectatorship before covering gender, codes, narrative and genre. Chapter 9, 'Interactive Media', investigates how semiotic analysis relates to new forms of media, including mobile communication, the internet, computer games and interactive television. Here Bignell concentrates on a very limited number of examples and instead relies on a general discussion of interactivity's social affects. While the chapter may help to initiate classroom discussion, it is less useful as a direct application of semiotic theory.

The issue of meaning underlies any case that must be made for semiotics, and Bignell addresses its complexities early in the book. In his analyses, he recognises the role that intertextuality and audience agency play within semiotic claims about the meaning of media forms. While the media examples he chooses to examine are predominately British, they are recognisable. The book assumes no prior knowledge of semiotic discourse and works as a readable and accessible introduction to the field.

Buckingham, David (ed.), Small Screens: Television for Children, Leicester University Press, London and New York, 2002, ISBN 0 8264 5944 7, 230 pp., A$49.95. Distributor: Allen & Unwin.

Small Screen's central focus is on the textual structure of children's television programs in the United Kingdom and United States. The book also includes a piece analysing websites being developed by children's television companies.

David Buckingham introduces the collection with a discussion on the precarious position in which dedicated children's television currently finds itself, and asks the question: 'Is television for children necessary in the first place, and if so why?' The 10 contributors to Small Screen endeavour to answer this question with detailed analysis of specific texts contextualised within wider debates about childhood and children's culture and the economic priorities of the television industry. Topics include the child audience as a 'significant new market', together with comments on the changing politics of education in Britain and the United States.
