crossroads in her life and the randomness of the game as it is played on the streets suits her mood The rules are unwritten the teams a haphazard collection of players and unlike anything else around her the courts feel like home So wherever there is a game she gets her ball and goes From the rough male dominated inner city courts of Chicago she travels to lazy oceanside pickup games in sunny California and dilapidated gyms in her Bible Belt home state In a street smart voice full of understated humor and palpable hope King chronicles her journey using the rhythms of the court to riff on the issues of race class gender religion sexual politics and love Ultimately through the jubilant swish of the net the brunt of an egregious foul and the knowing glance of a stranger who says yes you can be on my team King discovers in those rare moments on the court the countless things she wants in life but cannot name
