

	It's unlikely you will be able to fit person specification, if you can meeting that criteria (e.g. if your undertaking training then great, if there are a few others you can undertake) it's possible.
Have you researched the role and organisation, including the organisational values?	One of the most common 'buzz' NHS supporting information asks on yourself and forgetting to talk you are applying to. Most hiring managers are looking for the initiative. Showing that your organisation is an early user of it shows a look at the organisation's needs about the organisation you are applying for. If you're applying to a role at the Lincoln profile of it (George then name for roles) - an example in your supporting state understand what the organisation is also worth thinking about the values and how they align with a values somewhere in your supporting information include values-related across applications. Get someone else to check your statement before you submit it
Get someone else to check your statement before you submit it	It sounds really obvious, but you times hiring managers see spell sentences and other errors in it. Laying these out of mistakes at early to understand any issues. Be attention to detail". Get someone your work, or at the very least go check for issues.

How should I structure my supporting statement?
Our advice is to think about structuring your supporting statement

Writing a great NHS job application

Statements/supporting information statements also called your supporting information) in the job application. If you've shown that you have the skills needed to be considered in the role in the first part of your chance to really convince the recruiting interviewer.

Remember why you want this particular role. Experiences and skills are particularly useful to the statements "prepare" for things that should go into your job you come across as a strong candidate with a job being advertised.

Statement: a framework

It's a checklist for things that you should be bearing in mind to help you write a great personal statement.

Statement
An advert webpage is the part of the recruitment site that the hiring manager is likely to have had the most influence over. The skills and experience they list in the limited space of the webpage are what they are most important - so focus on showing how you fit these. You're looking for: with examples where possible. It will show how you meet these criteria. It's unlikely application will progress. Remember that you might be given a thought to what the hiring manager is looking for, compared to what they've seen in the job post in the advert, as explained in Part 1 of this guide.

Show why you're passionate about your field	Skills and experience will only take you so far - for many NHS jobs, there are a large number of applicants with similar degrees and roughly the same experience. Showing your passion for health and care is a relatively easy way to stand out in terms of your personality. What makes you get into your field? Don't be afraid of telling some personal stories here - hiring managers want people who have a genuine emotional connection to working in the NHS!
Explain how you meet as many of the criteria in the person specification table as possible	Once you've listed all the criteria mentioned in the job advert, you should try and methodically work through the rest of the person specification table to show how you meet the other skills and experience listed, especially those shown as "essential", again, try and include examples where you can.
